Culinary Critic

-Damn

Each week, our resident critic takes a look at the previous issue and lets you know just what you didn't miss...

The lead page was a nice, open, friendly front page. A Table of Contents is not of much use to those who haven't seen GDT before or just read it straight through. The ad page was something new for us: it gives you a warm fuzzy feeling inside to know that somebody with money loves you, doesn't it?

On page 1 (or as anybody with any counting skills might have noticed, page THREE), the text was average; nothing special. But our illustrator kicks ass! I loved the idea of the musical score. The song was gay, but I still appreciated the thought. "As we are an electronic savy group..." Ouch. That was really sad. I'm afraid that some members of our staff are piss-poor proofreaders. But our illustrator takes ass in his hands and boots it across the room! Page 3: Love the foot. NOTICE OF TYPOGRAPHICAL ERROR: The name of the author of Martyr of the Week was accidentally spelled wrong, and appeared as "Troy Liston" in our previous issue. The correct spelling is "Troy 'Whip me! Whip me! Stick me with thorns!' Liston." We apologize for marring Troy's reputation with this error. The highlight of page 4 should have been the the depiction of Failure on the Rider Card, but our illustrator sucks ass and is a worthless piece of shit slacker. I liked the idea of the new faerie column. Faeries are cool.

Melancholy Predator—best part of page 1? The reference to Tori Amos. Nice angel right in the middle of half your sentences, Mr. Expert Graphic Designer. On the second page of MP, one of those lovely poems showed its wretched face. That poetry writer guy would be really screwed if he didn't have his tab key. "You mean I have to push that big bar at the bottom of the keyboard FIVE TIMES? Oh, it's too much! Too much! You're stifling my creative muse!" As for last week's Urban Legend, this is what I think: Chicken Boo sucks; the polka sucks.

Overall, this issue was about par as Hell's Kitchen publications go. New record for length, though.

We said we'd get him, and after much coaxing, pampering, and a whole box of sugar cubes, here he is...

*Batteries not included. Void where prohibited (sorry Tennessee). Warning: May contain small pieces. Ages 5 and up. See GDT page 3 for details.

Desperately Seeking Staff

The Kitchen is open, and there's a help wanted sign on the door. Many of our staff members are still actively working, but some graduated and others moved on, and as we all know, long distance relationships are hard to keep. So Hell's Kitchen is currently seeking staff members to fill out the ranks of Gracies Dinnertime Theatre and the Melancholy Predator publications.

We're looking for writers, illustrators, poets, and people with a lot of funny ideas. If you'd like to join our first page collaborative efforts, any and all are welcome to attend staff meetings. Alternatively we accept submissions of all kinds.

We will print any submissions as long as the author can justify their existence. Come join us, and feel the power of the dark side.

Both publications may be reached via diablo@csh.rit.edu or handwritten submissions, photos, or messages may be sent to:
