Culinary Critic

-Damn

Each week, our resident critic takes a look at the previous issue and lets you know just what you didn't miss...

I heard that a few people liked my column last week. Unfortunately, this one probably won't match up, since I actually have a few positive things to say. It's too bad this is only funny when I bitch.

I saw on the ad page, "subscriptions now offered." What, do our editors really think that people will pay money for this swill? I was glad to see that the illustrator for Gracies Dinnertime Theatre was back in top form last week for "Gravity Kills"(That squeezing pic was just a little too graphic for me, though.). "Gravity Kills" itself was good,too--especially liked all those sesquipedalians.

That last editorial scared the bejeezus out of me: Sean's going to get MEAN! Oh, no! Fear the pygmoid! Tiny tot terror! You'd be amazed at all the rage that can build up in a body that can tower over a yard stick by a good half-foot.

I thought that the "World Tour" page was cheesy space-filler, but it turns out that it was there on purpose and that it was supposed to be funny . .. its still a cheesy space-filler, though.

Now, remember what I said aboutTroy in the first "Cul Crit?" "Stick me with thorns!" There was your proof, right there on page four. That's our Troy, into pain and into garden vegetables ("mmm . . . pumpkins with soft, mushy insides . . . ahhhh").

You might not have noticed, but there was an incredible achievement last issue! Yes, it was possible to read the text of Melancholy Predator! And yet, strangely, my life has not changed. I still think it's crap. Hmm. Liked the Simon = Satan illus. "Incident" wasn't too awful, but I was horrified to see not just one, but two poems. Will they never learn?!? "A Bad Day," however, was just fantastic! More quality writing from the Bard himself, Scorpio! Not. Urban Legend--let's review the facts: 1) it sucked. 2) it has sucked consistently. 3) we've already heard these stupid stories anyway! Will they never learn?!?

Anybody noticing a trend here?
