-Damn

Each week, our resident critic takes a look at what's going on and shares his...esteemed opinion with us:

I want to apologize for mistakes that appeared in the main feature of last week's GDT. A few were my fault; a few I had corrected but the editors didn't change. Eh, win some, lose some.

The funniest part of our last issue was certainly the letter sent in by alert reader Keven Eckles. I laughed the first time I read it, and it still makes me laugh.

I've been asked not to dwell on it too much, so I'll just say that it was weak. In a completely unrelated statement, I'd like to let everyone know that not only do I think that "short people can't be mean, can't have valid points, and can't be angry," but also that they are simply emotionless zombies with poor debating skills. Really. Once they pop over, say, 5' 8," then they stop being sub-humans.

The best part from last week that was written by a staff member, not a guest humor writer, was "Fey Denizen." It was definitely the best one in the series yet: even though it wasn't totally focused. The idea of linking faeries and our little grey friends is most cool. Hey, if aliens were the same as faeries, there'd be twice as much evidence for the gov't to lie about. And our front page pic on this topic was also the best one so far. Those big black eyes beat out a guitar or a spoon any day.

Now for the rest of the issue. "Crit,""Nostalgia," and "Martyr" were pretty standard, nothing exceptional. Kelly's column went the way that all of her columns have gone before ("Okay, Kelly, you do whatever wacked-out shit you want to, and have a good time doing it. Just don't hurt me."). Melancholy Predator's microwave article was decent, though the text was a little small. I am, in fact, beginning to like "End Time Chirurgeon." I needn't say anything about the poems (you should've gotten the drift by now), and "Urban Legend"--oh, it hurts, it hurts.

A fairly good issue all in all.

Today's column has been brought to you through the inspiration of Troy Liston (motto: "This might bleed a little, but you'll get used to it").

Excerpt from "Cadence", to be printed in the publication Cereal:

"Now you know. Now you see how things are, and now I'm on this side. But I will not laugh. Hush, now. I will help you..."
