Within the last month, RIT has placed various Trooh video screens around campus, mostly around frequently visited areas. These include the area near Beanz in Grace Watson Hall, the separating space between Generic Cantina & Grille* and Global Village Market, and RITZ. These screens depict various material, including advertising for NBC sports & Billboard, random trivia, and some RIT event info. They also have “fast charging” stations that I’ve personally never seen used.

Now, RIT is not new to advertising. Normally this is through the use of various posters, with videos usually reserved for RIT material. These Trooh screens appear, in my opinion, intrusive. Though I suppose that’s the point of advertising. They seem more like something I’d see in a mall, or some other commercial area.

In fact, I am rather unfond of them. Their company name “Trooh” (seemingly pronounced as “true”) is unflattering at the very least, falling under a modern (though longstanding) trend of four to five letter names, see the term “Poob” in relation to various streaming services.† It also looks like an insult, despite being a homophone. Their official logo is “trooh” with a lower-case t, and the “oo” as rolling eyes. I know they aren’t, but it makes me think these are some kind of security apparatus. It also seems that the “ooh” stands for [Digital] Out of Home. Presumably then the name is supposed to stand for “TRue Out Of Home,” the “TRue” inferred from some advertising information about “True Reach. True Impressions. True Engagement.” That whole spiel. Getting that share of the attention economy, or whatever that thing is.

I’ve actively tried to distance myself from cable advertising,‡ and much of the material shown falls under that. The only cable ads I’ve watched in recent years are due to the Super Bowl, and its too often human-made horrors just within comprehension. Spite like this, unfortunately, puts advertising material into one’s mind.

But I digress. I suppose I must explain more about what “Trooh” is as a company rather than just ranting about the odd quirks of 21st century capitalism. It’s your usual NYC based advertising services company.

Trooh’s website claims they are the “most effective way to reach Gen Z in the real world” and “the only campus media network in North America.” A video ad there explicitly states their appeal is to allow companies to be present during college’s “unforgettable moments.” In more banal but esoteric business data, Trooh claims to have “76+ minute dwell time” & “40x screen exposure/month” by whatever metrics are used by Comscore.

Recently, according to LinkedIn, they’re partnering with Google Gemini to bring “study tools” to students. Oh.

Personally, I’d much rather have just a larger poster board or more places for them. It’s not likely they’ve been removed anyways. 🏠

* Patio? There have been some name changes I don’t care about.

† See: Tubi, Hulu, Vudu, Pluto, Xumo.

‡ Though I doubt online ads are better.

Looking at Trooh's website, trooh.com, shows that they view college campuses as "always-active, brand-safe environments" for targeted ads. Brand-safe? Is that all students are, captive audiences for corporations? Not only are we stuck walking past continuously scrolling ads to get to class, we are actually paying to be on this campus. We're paying to watch ads. At least make them static posters or something instead so I can fix my attention span.

Welcome back. There’s a chill in the air and it’s an even year. You know what that means: midterm election adverts.

Every single seat in the house is up for election and many senators are too. How do they afford every ad slot in Jeopardy!? Campaign finance. Someone has to foot that bill and it sure ain’t you and me.* OpenSecrets.org is a log of all the donations disclosed by any candidate and many larger organizations. So who bought our politicians?

Well, the best data available is for incumbents but I encourage you to poke around. Joseph Morelle, the current Rep for RIT is paid for mainly by the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) with a sprinkling of University of Rochester money, weapons manufacturers, and one beverage company.† Current UND Rep Julie Fedorchak is funded by oil, old folks, and oligarchs— but almost exclusively in-state interests. Did you see the $380,000 that was left after Morelle’s last campaign? Nice to have cash on-hand.

So, with the candidates having already picked their poison, now it’s time to pick yours.‡ Just read the label first. 📊

Associated Organization	Total	Individuals/ PACs
American Israel Public Affairs Cmte	$136,651
University of Rochester	$36,554
L3Harris Technologies	$36,300
Constellation Brands	$20,500
Carlyle Group	$17,500

Industry	Total	Individuals/ PACs

Republican leadership PAC	$63,500
Natural Gas transmission & distribution	$58,950
Commercial banks & bank holding companies	$50,100
Lobbyists & Public Relations	$47,100

* Or as Bullhorn Acacia would(n’t) say, you and I.
† Constellation is based out of Rochester.
‡ If you read this far, you probably vote down-ballot. Good! We will get into that next week.

Who’s on the Top of the Ticket?

For the RIT folks:

Governor: Hochul (D) is incumbent. Challengers are Blakeman (R), Anglade (I), and Makeley (I).
US Rep NY-25: Morelle (D) has represented you since 2018. McIntyre (R) is challenging.

For the UND folks:

US Rep ND-AL:§ Fedorchak (R) is incumbent. Challengers are Hammer (D), Neville (I), and Tuttle (I).

§ Just the US House and well, just one district, cause it is North Dakota.Ⓢ
Ⓢ NoDak is approximately as populous as Monroe County, NY (roughly 779,000 vs 750,500 people).

Dear Susan,

I have eaten nothing but soup for the past two days. Regrettably, my stomach is a little unhappy. Should I switch to my all pickle diet to stop being sick, or is my body just adjusting to soup?

-In a Pickle

Dear Mx. Pickle,

It seems you're experiencing some good old soup-shock. We've all been there! Don't give up just yet, as you haven't had a chance to experience the plethora of benefits of an all soup diet. However, I wouldn't be surprised if your body is going through pickle withdrawals as well. My advice is as follows: seek out a Polish restaurant, and order yourself some zupa ogórkowa. This hearty pickle soup should help you bridge the gap between your diets. After a few days of this, you will be able to expand to other varieties of soup once again. I wish you the best of luck on your soup endeavors! 🏠

Food & Drink Reviews

The Somnambulant Sommelier

-by mighty_chondria

21+

Hailing from Glendale, Arizona by way of Hillside, New Jersey, this beverage is a light and refreshing way to drown the Sunday scares. The cans are elegantly elongated and environmentally conscious, recyclable if a frat bro were so inclined. The palate is vibrant with notes of malt and watermelon. The bouquet is excitable with carbonation. With a full bodied and fruity nature, decanting is unnecessary. Consider pairing White Claw Watermelon with dining hall take out, a vape, or your roommate's Cheetos. 📺

Jimmy John's — A Review

-by Honest Madman

I avoided this chain because I found the name off-putting. It felt like I would find dudebros being served by people that called you "sugar" or "hon."

I admit it: I was wrong to avoid getting food from there. A friend lost a bet and arranged for a sandwich to be delivered. Yes, the sandwich tasted like victory, but it was also the best sandwich I have ever had from a chain.

Jimmy John, I was wrong about you. I still have never stepped into one of your establishments. Maybe it is filled with articles of flair. Maybe it is surgical and simple, embodying brutalist spartanism. I don't know. I only know you make a great sandwich.

There are lessons to be learned here. Don't judge eating establishments by their name, for one. I now eagerly look forward to walking into White's Pharmacy, Hooters, and Slippery Dick's In-and-Out.

Yes! I embrace that food quality is not a function of name! Thank, you Jimmy John. Thank you. Thank you. 🍷

These two slippery dicks (Halichoeres bivittatus) look forward to serving you.

Bruce Moxie and the Orphan-Crushing Machine

-by Bruce Moxie

Bruce Moxie wasn't your typical tumbleweed Texan. He was a man of pure will, determination, and a body fat percentage too low to be medically believable. He didn't concern himself with such things as sleep or meals—every morning, he descended from his pull-up bar and pumped pureed grass-fed beef directly into his veins with an industrial syringe manufactured in a Boeing assembly plant. When he wasn't concerning himself with the amount of G-force he could exert on his extremities during his mid-afternoon Olympian frontflip session, he tore up the hammer and sickle banner and enacted the gnashing of teeth, reducing the nylon polyfiber to molecules.

Now, Texas had been a strange place as of late, what with senator Jerry Mander lurking about. Nobody knew quite too much about this man on account of his mysterious aura. What was known, however, was his promise to put an end to the mystical orphan-crushing machine.

"Vote me into office, and I promise you great citizens of Texas that I will finally halt the construction of the terrible contraption you all have been so worried about," exclaimed Mander at his political campaign speech.

"Yes, Mister Mander! We need you!" replied the crowd in wonderstruck awe. They didn't seem to think twice about this machine...all except for Bruce.

Bruce Moxie had always been suspicious of this Mander man. He had a face that not even his mother could love, a ravenous, wrinkly smile that emitted dangerous beta particles, and a raspy yet attractive voice that made the crowd put their hands together in such a rhythmic fashion that you would think they were wired to the floor they stood up on. Bruce couldn't help but wonder, why is Mander in charge of an orphan crushing machine?

As such, Bruce began the plan of a man, a plan to scan what ran through the man, the flagman hackman who hid a terrible secret. His heart pumped blood into his brain as his neural folds surged in a true Texan cacophony. He would break into Mander's campaign headquarters and uncover the shivering nude form of his true intentions.

That same night, Bruce set his plan into action. He tiptoed through the night with all the grace of a drunken baby, only staying hidden by his hideously malformed muscular silhouette. With his body juiced up on intravenous GMO beef and several unnamed military beverages, he gently removed the comically large circular vault door from Mander's machinational menagerie and set it aside like a quivering animal.

He found blueprints inside the cold, greasy metal filing cabinets that lined the walls. Inside, written in neat Congressional handwriting, were the plans for the orphan-crushing machine— a whopping thirty feet tall, chrome-plated, FDIC insured, and fitted with enormous gears that seemed suspiciously human in proportion. The design was very human. That's when Bruce saw something that made the hairs on his amazing human form stand on end.

According to the beautifully written notes in the tight little margin, Mander wasn't going to prevent this thing from being brought to meatspace. His true intentions were far more sinister than even Bruce could fathom...he was upgrading it to crush 300% more orphans per minute. That's a threefold efficiency increase, truly a marvel of engineering. Still, not good. Bruce's nostrils widened in disbelief, his pupils dilating as his palms deposited enough sweat to completely hydrate a family of four along with a pet dog. His face began to rapidly reshape, becoming more aerodynamic by the minute, which didn't seem possible before. He poked his beefy finger into the center of the saline-soaked document.

“Not today, commie,” Bruce uttered gutturally in a frequency so low it shook the walls.

The machine, the blueprints said, was planned to be constructed in a subterranean chamber directly beneath the Texas capital in the chamber of legislative secrecy (just between the oriental café and the Tesla charging station). But there was a problem: the materials to build the machine were locked in that room behind a door that required a custom-fitted key, as most do. Bruce also knew that Mander was the only one who had such a key. His fists tightened in pure American frustration as the paper inside them detached from their molecular bonds.

He kept reading through the scrolls and found another piece of vital information that would help him on his journey: there was a second key. It had been stolen, however, by a mysterious femme force only known as Abuela Imigrante. As punishment, she had been sent to the border tower of doom to be deported on the 17th of October. Bruce checked his high-wattage combat-grade nuclear-powered watch and saw that it was already the 16th of October.

“Oh no, oh no! This assignment is due— I mean, I have to get the key before the end of October 17th!” Bruce whispered deafeningly to himself and everyone else who might have been listening. He barrel rolled through the wall, causing half of the entire structure to collapse. Massive clouds of dust and debris billowed through the air as the impact of the foundation collided with the ground, sending shockwaves through the city. Bruce was unscathed and was making a beeline directly toward the border tower of doom.

To make a long, long story short, he finally arrived at the tower. Signs and branding everywhere told him that the tower was sponsored by a large pharmaceutical company and three fast-food chains. Abuela Imigrante had taken the key months ago, apparently with the same intent that Bruce now carried: to save the orphans. She had been detained for “attempted heroism and possession of unwarranted morality.” Wake up, America. Geez.

When Bruce arrived, he saw her crocheting malevolently through the bars of her cell.

“Are you Abuela Imigrante?” Bruce asked. She shifted her gaze to Bruce’s hulking frame and swallowed back a bolus of vomit caused by his grotesque form.

“Who wants to know? You with ICE, or with America?” she interrogated him. “Neither,” replied Bruce. “I’m with vengeance.” Lame! Who does he think he is, Batman?

She smiled, a hideous, wrinkled smile that ended all metabolic processes of any organism that saw it. But not Bruce. Today, he had his military-grade antimemetic UV obliterators on his face, and ain’t nothin’ gettin’ past them there shades.

“Then you’re late,” she uttered in her terrible immigrant voice. She produced the key from her embroidered Mexican zapato and handed it over without an ounce of hesitation. Slow your roll, grandma.

“End that machine. And when you do, tell Mander that Abuela sends her regards— and a tax audit.”

Hours later, Bruce stormed the Texas capital with all the stealthy precision of a souped-up Plymouth Barracuda. Down the mysterious marble hall he crept, waddling past portraits whose glazed-over eyes seemed to follow him and who whispered their campaign slogans. At last, he reached the chamber and found Senator Mander blocking the door, who turned around to face him.

“Just what do you think you’re— oh, God. Oh, my God,” whimpered the senator as he witnessed true Texan beauty in its rawest, unfiltered form. It proved too much for him to handle and he died immediately of a very violent brain aneurysm. Bruce shuffled over to Mander's lifeless body, picked it up with his horse fingers, and ate it. As long as it was within his macros, he could eat whatever he wanted. The formaldehyde coursing through his veins might have had an adverse effect on Bruce's circulo-respiratory system, but eh, whatever.

He waltzed into the chamber and found several piles of clockwork machinery strewn about like a steampunk hobbyist's wet dream. He waltzed over and instead of eating them, he picked each one up in his gigantic calloused hands and pulverized them one-by-one with a mere glance. You can't build an orphan-crushing machine with powder. Well, unless you reshape the powder back into a shape with a mold and sinter it back into a single mass. Luckily, Bruce's years of expertise operating a heavy-duty steel mill back where he got that syringe came into play. He recognized a powder metallurgy setup in the corner of the chamber and reduced it to its elementary particles with his earlobe.

Bruce was now content. His duty was done. The orphans were saved.

Chicken Bam-Bam

-by Rock Goblin

Creates One pan, One Knife, and One Cutting board in terms of dishes.

Ingredients:

- 1 chicken breast
- Around 3 to 4 baby bella mushrooms
- Around 4 to 5 cloves of garlic (can add more if wanted)
- Two big pinches of rosemary
- Big pinch of salt
- Smoked paprika
- A little oil
- Pan
- Hammer
- Cutting board
- Reasonably sharp big knife
- Plate
- Plastic wrap

Mince mushrooms and garlic well, then put aside. Slice the chicken breast open "taco style" creating a large pocket. Stuff with minced mushrooms, garlic, rosemary, and salt. Wrap stuffed chicken breast in saran wrap, then hit with hammer until flat, ensuring stuffing does not fall out. Put oil in pan, then heat. Once hot enough to cook meat, rub stuffed chicken breast with salt and smoked paprika. Sear well on each side, then reduce heat and cover to ensure filling gets cooked. Once done, serve with a starch and vegetable of chef's choice.

This dish, invented by my emotionally repressed father in lieu of going to therapy, delights children and adults alike. By flattening the chicken, even and quick cooking is ensured, and by placing the majority of the seasonings inside the chicken, the flavor of the cooking mushrooms and garlic becomes absorbed by the meat, making an ordinary dish extraordinary.

If desired, making a simple sauce by deglazing the pan with a dry white wine is highly recommended.
